Three Senators have joined in demands that the General Assembly be asked to censure Soviet espionage activities through the United Nations.

Senator Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, sharply criticized what he said was Acting Secretary General U Thant's request for funds for a school in Moscow for training 22 Russians yearly for jobs at U. N. headquarters.

The United States, he said yesterday, would be called on "to foot the lion's share of the bill" for training "prospective spies against the United States."

Senator Pastore, Democrat of Rhode Island, chimed in to say he "completely agreed that the United States ought not to pay one nickel" on any school in Moscow. Senator Pastore pointed out that Russia has not paid a nickel on its U. N. assessments for peacekeeping operations in the Congo.

Senator Thurmond, Democrat of South Carolina, added that if steps are not taken to see that Soviet spying at the U. N. is discontinued, "the people of America are going to rise up."

Senator Dodd's speech, previously released as a statement, dealt with a list of 18 Soviet U. N. representatives and employees of the U. N. who, he said, had been discovered engaging in spying activities.

If funds for the U. N.'s Moscow training school are approved, he said, it would raise serious doubt about the wisdom of continuing United States financial support to the U. N.
